Indiana Landmarks and Indiana Farm Bureau present the John Arnold Award for Rural Preservation to recognize the preservation and continued use of historic farming-related buildings.

The award is named in memory of John Arnold (1955-1991), a Rush County farmer who combined progressive architectural practices with a deep respect for the natural and historic components of rural landscapes, including the farm owned by his family since 1820. The award winner receives a handsome outdoor marker.

Anyone may submit a nomination, including the owners of the farm. Judges consider the following criteria when selecting the winner:

- Farm buildings must be utilized in an active farming operation
- All buildings, including the house, should possess a high level of historic integrity and retain character-defining features such as original construction and cladding materials, windows and doors
- Buildings do not have to serve their original use. Sympathetic alterations necessary to accommodate new uses or modern farming equipment are acceptable
- The farm should be managed by the property's owner
- Preference is given to farms that are full-time
